

About Me

I'm a story-telling multimedia artist with interests in American history and the nature of religion.

I've had a career as a prize-winning medical writer and editor, running magazines and marketing new prescription pharmaceuticals.

My academic credentials include a B.A. in religious studies from Yale University, an M.Div. (that's right—I'm a Master of Divinity!) from Princeton Theological Seminary, and an M.A. in journalism from the University of North Carolina—Chapel Hill.

Although my extensive religious background includes a stint as president of the Yale Christian Fellowship and three years' worth of training to become a minister, I'm no longer a Christian.

Under another alias, I've been a singer-songwriter specializing in story-songs. I used to perform in clubs and universities in and around NYC, and an album of mine was broadcast at hundreds of college radio stations. I also wrote and performed "The Dollar Song" for a Travel Channel commercial.

These days I'm focused on multimedia projects that tell stories, accompanied by music I've composed. I've begun posting them on YouTube.

I've written an interpretive history of the United States, now sitting in limbo while I pursue other interests.
